This article is concerned with a few cases of reanalysis and grammaticalisation in the development of Mauritian Creole. It examines the historical development of the postnominal definite article Ia, the negative marker pa, the past tense marker ti, the aspect marker fini and the plural marker ban in the French creoles of the Indian Ocean (including Mauritius) and compares their development to the development of these same items in the French creoles of the Caribbean. It argues, on the basis of detailed comparison of historical data, that the similarities that exist between the French creoles of these two different geographical regions with respect to the development of these categories are the result of independent parallel grammaticalisation rather than development from a common 'proto-creole. It also discusses two other cases sipa and banane but argues that these may have resulted from reanalysis rather than grammaticalisation.
